BANK 2.0

How Customer Behavior and Technology Will Change the Future of Financial Services

By Brett King

The financial crisis is just beginning for retail institutions.

Over 90% of all bank transactions are now executed electronically. For most consumers, the traditional branch office is a thing of the past: the modern bank is anywhere with an Internet connection. Yet even as consumers embrace online banking, ATMs, and smart phones, the banks themselves continue to structure their philosophy, organization, and investments around brick and mortar branch offices.

In Bank 2.0, author Brett King explains why customer behavior is changing more rapidly than anyone expected, why checkbooks are disappearing altogether, and why your mobile phone may soon replace your wallet—and how banks and their branches can evolve to not only accommodate the changes, but use them to their advantage. With coverage in the Huffington Post, Boston Globe, and American Bankers Association Banking Journal, Bank 2.0 reveals why current banking models are being stretched to the limit, and how continued technology innovations, social networking, smarter smartphones, and constant mobility are the future of retail banking.

The founder of the International Academy of Financial Management, Brett King is a regular speaker at top global financial conferences, and an acknowledged expert on wealth management, customer experience, and retail channel distribution strategy. Brett previously helmed the Asia division of Modern Media and the E-Business service line for Deloitte. His clients include HSBC, Citigroup, UBS, Standard Chartered, Abu Dhabi Commercial Bank, and many more.

They spoke to many people on both sides . . . they convey a vivid feel for what Singapore was like, how it has changed over the decades, and how the PAP itself has changed as Singapore was transformed under PAP leadership."—Lee Hsien Loong, Prime Minister of Singapore
